From a Jungian perspective 2027: Taboos in Psychotherapy

In 2027, we wish to dedicate our “Jungian perspective” series to a very special topic, namely taboos in psychotherapy. In the words of C.G. Jung, one would speak of shadow themes, and we would like to focus above all on our own shadow themes as psychotherapists, rather than, as usual, on the shadows of our patients.

Which topics are omitted in analytical psychology? Where should we look more closely and critically reflect? What shadows do we psychotherapists have? Which topics trigger our defense mechanisms, and how do we deal with them when taboo subjects arise in practice?

We wish above all to invite newcomers to submit talks for our format, as well as experienced speakers.

Possible topics (please be inspired by these, but do not feel restricted - we are very open to other content):

- Analytical psychology and esotericism
- Disgust, fear and aggression as a psychotherapist
- Growing old as a psychotherapist
- C.G. Jung and the Second World War
- When psychotherapists themselves have psychological problems
- Antipathy and analysis
- What if therapy fails or even causes harm?
